

Awareness, Life and The Science of Truth:

The Primary Definitions

Awareness is any state of being that is either pure existence or may also involve coexistence of awareness with any number of beliefs and experiences.

Life is a scientific process of defining beliefs and testing them by experience.

Science is any system of defining one or more beliefs and testing them by experience.

Truth is any belief system that has been defined and then tested by experience and found to match exactly with the defined belief system. Partial truth is a partial match. Untruth is a substantial or complete lack of match.

Testing is any process that allows a belief to become experience-able. Examples of testing processes include sensing, feeling, perceiving, reasoning, and cognizing.

Beliefs are any ways of defining in awareness a potential sensation, feeling, perception, reasoning process, and/or cognition.

Experiences are any ways of sensing, feeling, perceiving, reasoning, and/or cognizing beliefs that result in increased awareness – that is, fundamental pure existence plus an increased awareness of truth in the form of matching beliefs and experiences.

Vehicles: A life process may involve establishing a vehicle for testing certain beliefs.

Death is the breakdown or deliberate relinquishing of a vehicle during or after a period of testing.

Enlightenment is the experience of truth as a permanent and reliable experience for the testing of any belief. It is an option that optimizes the Life/Death process.
